YOU'VE SEEN TOO MUCH FOR YOUR OWN GOOD, MY DEAR!

BACK AT THE POLICE STATION -

I'M WORRIED, SARGE! BARBARA SHOULD'VE RETURNED LONG AGO!

AH, JUST LIKE A WOMAN, BE-JABERS! CAN'T TAKE A JOKE! SHE MUST'VE GOTTEN MAD AND WON'T COME BACK!

NO, I DON'T THINK SO, BABS ISN'T LIKE THAT-I THINK I'LL DO SOME CHECKING!

603 ELM STREET-THIS MUST BE THE PLACE, ALL RIGHT!

GOOD EVENING, MRS. WHITLOCK! DID A GIRL REPORTER CALL ON YOU THIS AFTERNOON?

A GIRL-REPORTER? GRACIOUS SAKES--- WHAT WOULD A REPORTER WANT WITH ME?

YOU MEAN SHE WASN'T HERE?

OF COURSE NOT! AND-NOW! IF YOU'LL EXCUSE ME-I'M IN A HURRY TO LEAVE!

HERE'S WHERE PATROLMAN KIP BURLAND LEAVES OFF AND THE BLACK HOOD PICKS UP!

WHEREVER SHE'S GOING, SHE'S IN AN AWFUL HURRY TO GET THERE!

ALL RIGHT, IGNATZ, YOU CAN STOP THERE AND DISPOSE OF THOSE BOXES!

WHAT TH--? HE'S GOING TO TOSS THOSE BOXES OVER THE CLIFF INTO THE RIVER BELOW!

-BUT NOT BEFORE I HAVE A LOOK AT THEM!

GOOD LAND!

ER-BY THE WAY, DO YOU HAVE A PICTURE OF YOUR HUSBAND?

WHY, NO, MY GRIEF WAS SO GREAT, I COULDN'T BEAR SEEING HIS FACE!! I DESTROYED THEM ALL!

IS THIS A PICTURE OF YOUR HUSBAND?

Y-YES! WHO GAVE IT TO YOU?

--OR TO PUT IT MORE ACCURATELY, THE POLICE LABORATORY DID! YOU SEE, THERE'S A WAY OF RECONSTRUCTING THE FEATURES OF A SKELETON, CALLED THE BERTILLON METHOD! APPARENTLY, THEY HIT IT CLOSE ENOUGH TO FOOL EVEN YOU!

THEY ALSO FOUND A BULLET IN HIS BRAIN! A VERY NEAT IDEA, MRS. WHITLOCK--MURDERING YOUR HUSBAND AND THEN HIDING HIS CORPSE IN YOUR CELLAR FOR SEVEN YEARS--THE LAST PLACE ANYBODY WOULD THINK OF LOOKING!

YOU KNEW, THAT AFTER SEVEN YEARS, HE'D BE DECLARED LEGALLY DEAD! AND YOU COULD COLLECT HIS LIFE-INSURANCE--$200,000 WORTH!

THE STRANGE CASE OF MICHAEL DEAN

A BLACK HOOD STORY

THE bullet bit into Michael Dean's shoulder . . . but he didn't cry out. He didn't make a sound. He couldn't. He was a mute . . .

But his family heard the shot and they came rushing into his room. They saw him lying on the floor with blood gushing from his right shoulder . . . saw him writing awkwardly with his left hand, attempting to tell his family in a note what he couldn't tell them by word of mouth. Across the room was an open window. It was only a five foot drop to an alley downstairs, and the attacker had apparently escaped this way. The gun was lying on the ground downstairs.

The note was simple.

"Madman attacked me. Came in through window, rushed at me and shot me in shoulder. Never saw him before. . . ."

Then the police came, and with them, Patrolman Kip Burland. Michael Dean's family was clustered around him, acting tender and sympathetic. It was a pretty little family scene, but Kip's keen eyes fixed themselves briefly on Michael Dean's right hand . . . and he wondered if there might not be more to it than an escaped madman. . . .

He stepped up to Michael Dean and examined his right hand. "What's wrong with his thumb?" he asked Dorothy, the sister.

The thumb wasn't a pretty sight. It was stiff, paralyzed.

Dorothy stared. "Why—why, I don't know," she said. "I never noticed it before."

Burland turned to the wounded man. "You, Dean," he said. "You can hear me, can't you?"

Michael Dean nodded his blond head. There were tears deep in his eyes. Dorothy hissed into Kip's ear. "He can hear you. He's mute—but not deaf."

"All right," said Kip Burland. "What's wrong with your thumb, Dean?"

Dean reached for his pad. Stiffly, he scrawled:

"Can't understand it myself. It was all right this morning. I was using my right hand to hold my book up till the time I was attacked, and my thumb was all right."

Kip nodded. "I see," he said. "Look here, Dean, your note says that you never saw your attacker before. It doesn't seem logical that a man—even a maniac—would come through a window, shoot at you, and jump back out again unless he had something against you—some specific desire to hurt or kill you. Are you positive that you never saw him before? Couldn't you perhaps have forgotten?"

Dean shook his blond head vigorously.

Kip thought for a moment, then shrugged his shoulders. "What did he look like?" he asked.

"He was tall," Dean wrote, "tall and unshaven. Black stubble; heavy black eyebrows. Long black hair, dark eyes. Wearing a dirty brown suit. That's all I saw."

"That's plenty," Kip said. "I guess this is just routine. The police'll pick him up." He walked to the door.

And then at the door, he stopped. "I almost forgot," he said. "Dorothy, will you come over here for a minute?"

She came over.

"There's something I forgot to ask. Has Michael been mute all his life?"

"Why," said Dorothy, "as a matter of fact, he hasn't. He had a streak of bad luck four years ago, and the failure of his vocal cords came right on the tail end of it."

"Let's hear about this streak of bad luck."

Dorothy's eyes became clouded. "First," she said, "Michael's business went bankrupt—and he was left without a cent. Then, suddenly, Michael's wife contracted pneumonia—and she died. And right on top of that, Michael woke one morning and found himself unable to speak . . . and the doctor couldn't do anything about it. . . ."

Kip Burland nodded thoughtfully "I see." He drew a deep breath. "Well, Dorothy, I'm sorry I can't be of any help—but the police operate dragnets . . . and they have the facilities to capture the maniac. Any attempts I would make would be amateur stuff."

He waved goodbye to the entire family and left.

But outside, he became The Black Hood. Then, quickly, he set to work.

He knew it wasn't any use doing so, but he checked anyway. He checked with every insane asylum and sanitarium within two hundred miles and learned that no inmate had escaped.

And then he went back to Michael Dean's house. . . .

Dean's family was still gathered around him. They stared in astonishment as The Black Hood entered the room.

"Dean," The Hood said, "listen to me. I've come to help you."

Dean breathed heavily for a moment. Then he lifted his pad and wrote, "I recognize you, Black Hood. How do you mean—help me?"

It was then that Dean noticed that The Hood had a small, medical-type bag with him. "Dean," The Black Hood said, "I'm going to restore your voice."

Again Dean's pencil moved across his pad, and his fingers shook as he did so. "How?" he wrote.

"I am going to attempt a treatment which doctors would be afraid to try. If you're willing to take the chance, I think I can restore your voice."

Dean's hands shook as he wrote hurriedly, "Anything, I'll take any chance. . . ."

"All right," said The Hood. "Lie back in your chair."

Several members of the family protested, but The Hood waved them aside. "Boiling water—quickly," he ordered. He put a white rag over Dean's nostrils and lifted a small bottle from his bag.

"This won't put you to sleep," he said. "It's just going to dull your senses and lessen the pain a bit. Get ready now."

He opened the bottle and poured a few drops onto the rag. Dean's breathing became heavier.

Then The Hood lifted a long pointed instrument from his bag. He dipped it momentarily into the hot water, and then, swiftly, plunged it down Dean's throat. Dean's body twitched. The Hood jabbed the instrument once, gently, and then withdrew it.

"You're in luck," said The Hood. "I punctured a mucous stoppage which was keeping your vocal cords from operating. Try to talk."

A sound issued from Dean's throat . . . a gurgling sound.

hideous and horrible. And then Dean shrieked, "I can speak! I can speak. . . ."

The Black Hood smiled. "Now look at your thumb—the one that was paralyzed."

Dean stared downward. The thumb was normal again. . . .

"That operation I performed was a phony," The Hood said. "I'm not a surgeon—I don't know a thing about operating. . . ."

Dean stared at him. "But—but I don't understand. Then how . . ."

"Look," said The Hood, "I don't know anything about operations—but as a crimefighter I do know a great deal about the mental workings of people—about psychiatry. That's how I was able to analyze your case as anaesthesia."

The Hood paused. Then he continued: "Let me tell you a little about anaesthesia," he said. "It's a funny mental disease—the strangest known to psychiatric science, perhaps. And only one person can cure it—the patient himself."

"It appears, generally, just after a man or woman has had a series of mental shocks and bad breaks—when that man or woman is beginning to feel terribly sorry for himself or herself. It's a kind of mental pleading for sympathy—a begging for people to help the patient be miserable. . . ."

"I don't understand," Dean said again. "Are you trying to tell me . . ."

"Let me finish my explanation," interrupted The Hood. "At any rate, when a man has this mental desire for sympathy—something subconscious and strange happens. He becomes paralyzed. Sometimes it's an arm—sometimes it's a leg—and, sometimes, Dean, it's the vocal cords. The victim becomes paralyzed—as definitely paralyzed as if it were a true physical paralysis. Why, there have been cases where a patient pushed lighted cigarettes against his leg—and he'd hypnotized himself so thoroughly into believing that the leg was paralyzed that he didn't even feel the pain.

"That's what happened with you, Michael. You just carried it further than some others. You've sat around for four years seeking sympathy—and your family was getting a little used to you by now. So you faked this whole business—actually faked a shooting so that your family's sympathy for you could be renewed. And again your hypnosis worked on yourself. This time your thumb became paralyzed."

The Hood walked to the door—then slowly turned around, facing the group. "There's a treatment for anaesthetic patients," he said. "Your doctor must be a general practitioner with a gullible mind and no knowledge whatsoever of mental ailments . . . otherwise he would have diagnosed your case and used this treatment on you long ago. Just as the patient has hypnotized himself into imagining himself paralyzed . . . so must the psychiatrist hypnotize him into thinking he's been cured. I dropped some ordinary water on a piece of rag over your nostrils . . . dipped the surgical instrument into the boiling water—just to give you the illusion of an operation. Then I simply touched your throat with the instrument—and the momentary pain, plus my talk about attempting a treatment that doctors would be afraid to try, hypnotized you into thinking you'd been cured. Naturally, your supposedly paralyzed thumb—which had become that way during your new surge of desire for pity when you pulled that phony shooting—became normal in a hurry."

He opened the door. "Get wise to yourself, Dean," he said. "Stop feeling sorry for yourself—and go out and get a job."

Then he slammed the door behind him and went out into the night.
